

The Hollow Earth

The idea that the Earth is hollow is not new, but has been known since ancient times. As you will see by reading this article, the ancients knew this, having various prophecies about the civilisation of the Atlantean descendants from within, who at some point would return to the surface.

You will also see how the Nazis found out that the Earth is hollow following the famous expeditions to Tibet organised by the Ahnenerbe organisation, which was created specifically to study and research paranormal phenomena and the history of the Aryan race, among other things. In order for the reader to have a fair understanding of things, some historical aspects will be presented gradually to prove the veracity of the information.

Operation Shambala: the Nazis were looking for a way to reach the giants in the centre of the Earth! In the end, they succeeded!

Lhasa, Expedition beim Empfang tibetischer Würdenträger

In the spring of 1938, five German scientists who were members of the SS took part in a research expedition to Tibet. Almost forgotten today, this event was extremely controversial at the time and continued to fascinate conspiracy theorists for decades. Most of the controversy and discussion was not generated by the scientific results, but by the context of the expedition – on the eve of the Second World War – and its purpose, raising the question "what were the Nazis looking for in Tibet?"

We learn more from the publication Historia:

The expedition was led by a truly exceptional character: Ernst Schäfer. An adventurer, hunter, researcher, writer and member of the SS, he was a kind of Nazi Indiana Jones in the flesh. Born in Cologne, Schäfer had been passionate about wildlife since childhood, raising birds, insects, snakes, fish, squirrels and many other small animals. His room looked like a small menagerie, filled with cages, aquariums and terrariums used to observe animal behaviour. After graduating from high school in 1929, he enrolled at the University of Göttingen, where he studied zoology, botany and geography, dreaming of following in the footsteps of his hero, the Swedish geographer and explorer Sven Hedin.

Ernst Schäfer first arrived in Tibet in 1931, after joining an expedition organised by the American Brooke Dolan. Born into a wealthy family in Philadelphia, Dolan was already famous in the American press at the age of 21, thanks to his hunting expeditions in Asia. On the 1931 expedition, Dolan and Schäfer travelled up the Yangtze River in search of an extremely rare hunting trophy: the panda bear.

In 1935, he participated in a second expedition to Tibet, also led by Brooke Dolan. This time, they penetrated deeper into the country, but the constant threat from the Ngolok nomads, who controlled the area, led to the expedition's collapse. Dolan left the group and continued on alone, disguised as a Tibetan merchant, while Schäfer returned to China, floating down the Yangtze to Shanghai.

*Back in Germany, Ernst Schäfer published a book called Tibet, the Unknown, in which he advocated for a scientific expedition to the remote land. Numerous press articles turned the young man into a celebrity and brought him to the attention of Heinrich Himmler. In the summer of 1936, while Germany was preparing for the Summer Olympics, Schäfer met with Himmler in Berlin and obtained permission to organise an official expedition to Tibet, sponsored by the Ahnenerbe and composed of SS scholars.*

What were the Nazis looking for in Tibet?

The conversation between the two was not recorded. All information about this meeting comes from Ernst Schäfer, who told American investigators after he was captured in 1945. According to Schäfer, Himmler confessed to him some of his original beliefs: that the universe was formed as a result of a cosmic battle between fire and ice, that the Earth was once populated by giant species, and that the Aryan race descended directly from the sky. Schäfer told his interrogators that he did not share these ideas, which he considered ridiculous, although we can be sure that he did not laugh in Himmler's face.

The mysterious journey to Tibet of five German scientists, members of the SS, on the eve of World War II fascinated their contemporaries. Over time, numerous explanations have been put forward for this expedition, each more fantastical than the last: it was said that its purpose was to discover a link between Atlantis and the first civilisation of Central Asia; that Schäfer believed Tibet to be the cradle of humanity, where a caste of priests had created an empire of mystical knowledge called Shambhala, whose symbol was the swastika, the Buddhist wheel of life; or that the Nazis were looking for a secret substance that prolonged life and could be used to achieve a higher state of consciousness.

Unfortunately for conspiracy theorists, these hypotheses are false. Himmler, who considered himself a patron of German science, founded the Ahnenerbe society to study the origins of the Aryan race, from which pure Germans were descended. German archaeologists were tasked with unearthing Aryan prehistory, and numerous expeditions were organised for this purpose, the most ambitious of which was to Tibet. Himmler constantly tried to influence the work of scientists so that they would focus their attention on the pseudo-scientific subjects that interested him. However, it seems that Schäfer was not interested in this pseudo-science, firmly refusing to allow Edmund Kiss (a disciple of the "Welteislehre" theory, put forward by Hans Hörbiger) to join the expedition. Hörbiger claimed that Atlantis was destroyed by a great flood caused by the impact of an icy celestial body with the Earth. Himmler adopted this theory and believed that those who escaped from Atlantis emigrated to Central Asia, where they established a great civilisation.

An expedition that was born with difficulty

In December 1937, Schäfer finalised the expedition plan, which was to go to Eastern Tibet, with access from China. However, Schäfer was forced to make certain compromises regarding the members of the expedition and to accept the presence of anthropologist Bruno Beger, a proponent of the theory that Indo-Europeans originated in Central Asia, an idea that had been hotly debated in academic circles. Nevertheless, the differences between Schäfer and Himmler deepened and, in the end, the SS leader demanded that the Ahnenerbe withdraw its support and funding for the expedition.

Schäfer managed to raise the necessary funds on his own, but he still needed Himmler's political support. Himmler agreed to the expedition on condition that all members be members of the SS. In addition to Schäfer and Beger, the expedition included Ernst Krause, an entomologist, photographer and videographer, Karl Wienert, a geophysicist, and Edmund Geer, a logistics expert responsible for transport and supplies.

The political situation in East Asia forced Schäfer to change his initial plans. After learning that there was no way to reach Tibet via China, he had no choice but to cross India, where he had to negotiate with the British authorities. Schäfer therefore left for London in March 1938, where he obtained an important letter of recommendation addressed to Sir Aubrey Metcalfe, the British Foreign Minister in India.

The Tibetans, fascinated by the gadgets of the era

The five German explorers left for Calcutta in April 1938 and only managed to enter Tibet in December, after their entry permit had been refused twice, forcing them to spend six months in the small kingdom of Sikkim, in northern India. To everyone's surprise, they found no barriers, guards or soldiers at the Tibetan border. Only a pile of stones marked the border between the two countries.

Once in Lhasa, Schäfer managed to extend his residence permit several times, allowing them to stay in the Tibetan capital for two months. Shortly after their arrival, official visits began, and the members of the expedition managed to develop friendships with some local leaders, including Prime Minister Yapzhi Langdün, the nephew of the 13th Dalai Lama.

Anthropologist Bruno Beger had an extremely positive influence on the expedition members' relations with the Tibetans. With some medical training, he was able to successfully treat the illnesses of some members of the aristocracy.

A great advantage for the expedition was that photography was not a novelty for Tibetans. On the contrary, it seems that photography was introduced in Tibet as early as the end of the 19th century, and at the time of the German explorers' visit to Lhasa, there were already quite a few enthusiastic amateur photographers and even some professionals. Apart from one incident, when a local threw a stone at the camera, Beger reported that they encountered no difficulties while taking photographs.

The gifts offered to the locals by the Germans indicate a great interest among Tibetans in the technical achievements of the West. Since they did not have enough technical items to offer as gifts, Schäfer had to give away some of the expedition's equipment. Zeiss binoculars seem to have been particularly popular among Tibetan ministers. Schäfer also donated a Phillips radio, a camera, a phonograph, a gramophone, and ordered other gifts from Calcutta and even from Germany.

The most important event in Lhasa and the main reason for Schäfer's repeated requests to extend their stay was the "Monlam" (New Year Festival), which lasted more than three weeks. The explorers managed to attend the celebration, and Schäfer provided a vivid and extensive description of the festivities in his diaries and in his book, Das Fest der weissen Schleier, dedicated to this subject. Furthermore, the explorers were invited to participate in "Gyalpo Losar," the second day of the Tibetan New Year, which is considered a more important day than New Year's Day itself.

In order to obtain permission from the Tibetan government to visit the Yarlung Valley, considered the "cradle of Tibetan civilisation", where numerous monasteries and temples are located, Schäfer lied about the swastika symbol, claiming that it had been brought to Germany from the valley 5,000 years ago. 5,000 years ago.

One step away from death on his way home

The expedition ended sooner than the explorers would have liked, after Schäfer received a letter from his father informing him that war was imminent. The Germans left Tibet in a hurry and headed for Calcutta, where Schäfer was received in private audience by Lord Linlithgow, Viceroy of India, to whom he presented a detailed report on his expedition.

From Calcutta, the explorers boarded a British Airways flight bound for Baghdad, but were forced to make an emergency landing in Karachi due to technical problems. In Baghdad, they were lucky enough to change planes and fly to Athens on a Lufthansa aircraft. After landing, they learned that the British Airways plane that had technical problems in Karachi had crashed into the sea off Alexandria. A surprise awaited them in Athens: a new plane, provided by the German government, to take them home safely.

Regardless of the controversy it sparked and the problems it faced, Ernst Schäfer's expedition was a success in terms of the scientific material it collected. The expedition gathered tens of thousands of photographs and pages of detailed notes about the people of Tibet, as well as its flora and fauna. The German Federal Archives in Koblenz house an impressive collection of 17,000 negatives, out of the more than 20,000 taken by the expedition members. These images, which portray Tibet in the interwar period, are unique, given that the members of this expedition took a keen interest in every aspect of life in Tibet, from government and religion to the most intimate aspects of daily life.

Arrested after Germany's defeat, Schäfer was tried in Nuremberg but acquitted, the court finding him not guilty of war crimes. In December 1949, he moved to Venezuela, together with his wife and daughters, where he was offered a position as a researcher. Schäfer returned to Europe in 1954. He accepted an invitation from King Leopold III of Belgium to make a documentary about the Congo, a project he worked on for several years. Schäfer returned to Germany with his family, where he obtained a position as curator at the Niedersächsisches Landesmuseum in Hanover. The explorer died in July 1992.

The Tibetan prophecy about Germany!

German nationalist Jan Van Helsing (alias Jan Udo Holey) describes in his famous book "Who Rules the Planet Vol. 2" the secret aspects of the secret power within the Third Reich against the Illuminati.

The thousand-year-old prophecy of the "dGe-lugs-pa" (Yellow Hats), the highest Tibetan lodge, tells us that the "Roof of the World" (Tibet) will be moved to the "Land of the Midnight Sun" – namely Germany. This is why the Tibetans welcomed Karl Haushofer (founder of the Thule Society during the Third Reich) into their lodge. Tibet promised spiritual and practical support for the establishment of the "New Empire of Light" on earth, and in return, the first Tibetan colonies were established in Germany.

Tibetan monks helped behind the scenes, alongside the Knights Templar (the Marcionite Order and the Black Stone Lords) in building the Third Reich and establishing the "Thule Society" and the "Black Sun" (the highest lodge at the time). The goal of these lodges was to achieve Germany's autonomy from the Illuminati. This included independence from foreign capital and foreign influence, the prohibition of interest in banking, and, as a security measure, German labour instead of gold.

It was also the Tibetan monks who consecrated the children of the "Black Sun" at Wewelsburg, near Detmold, who are said to have been returned to Tibet by Rudolf Steiner. As we learn from the documents of the Vril Society, it was also through the monks that contact was established with the Aryans and the Aldebaranis. If we are to believe these documents, the Aldebaranis are an extraterrestrial race from the constellation Taurus, located 68 light years away, who claim to have colonised our planet with the Aryan race.

However, part of this race would live in the centre of the Earth, where they would have retreated during one of the ice ages—the sub-Earth empire is generally known as Agartha (in German, "Asgard"), and its inhabitants are the Aryans. Given that people with a certain degree of initiation clearly understood after the Versailles treaties that the Allies were planning a new war against Germany, in which, according to the Morgenthau plan, the German people would be completely wiped out, Adolf Hitler, as he repeatedly stated in Mein Kampf, formed a "Last Battalion" in case Germany lost the war. This "Last Battalion" was distributed in various regions of the world in the form of small colonies.

The most important of these were Neuschwabenland (Antarctica), Tibet, the Andes, Greenland, the Canary Islands, the African mountain range, Iraq, Japan and the underground centre of the Earth. Here is what the Führer said in his speech on 24 February 1945: "I predict today, imbued as always with faith in our people, the final victory of the German Reich." (Volkischer Beobachter, Berlin, 27 February 1945, p. 2). Or: "In this war there will be no victors or vanquished, only the dead and the survivors. The last battalion, however, will be German."

The secret Thule Society!

"Ultima Thule" was the capital of the first continent colonised by the Aryans. It was called "Hyperborea" and was older than Lemuria and Atlantis (continents swallowed by the ocean, where great civilisations once existed).

great civilisations). In Scandinavia, there is a legend about "Ultima Thule", this wonderful country in the North Sea where the sun never sets and where the ancestors of the Aryan race lived.

The continent of "Hyperborea" was located in the North Sea and was swallowed up during an ice age. It is believed that its inhabitants came from the solar system called Aldebaran, which is the main star in the constellation Taurus: they were about four metres tall, had white skin and were blond with blue eyes. They did not know war and were vegetarians (Hitler too). According to the alleged texts from Thule, the Hyperboreans were very advanced in their technology and used "Vril-ya", flying machines that we now call UFOs. Thanks to the existence of two counter-rotating magnetic fields, these flying discs were capable of levitation, could reach enormous speeds and performed surprising manoeuvres in flight, performances that we observe today in UFOs.

They used the Vril force as energy potential, i.e. as fuel (Vril = ether, or prana, chi, cosmic force, orgone... But this word also derives from the Akkadian "vri-IL", which means "similar to the highest deity" or "equal to God"). They therefore extracted energy (which costs nothing) from the Earth's magnetic field, as do the tachyon converters of Commander Hans Coler or the "quantum space" engine developed by Oliver Crane.

When the continent of Hyperborea began to sink, its inhabitants dug giant tunnels into the Earth's crust with large machines and settled under the Himalayan region. This underground kingdom is called "Agartha" or "Agarthi", and its capital is called "Shamballah". The Persians called this underground kingdom "Ariana" or "Arianne," the country of origin of the Aryans.

The ruler of this kingdom was "Rigden Iyapo," the king of the world, and his representative on Earth was said to be the Dalai Lama. Haushofer was convinced that this underground kingdom beneath the Himalayas was the place of origin of the Aryan race. He claimed to have obtained proof during his numerous travels in Tibet and India.

The distinctive symbol of Thule was the swastika with its arms pointing to the left.

According to Tibetan lamas and the Dalai Lama himself, the people called Agarthians still exist today. The underground kingdom, which is mentioned in all Eastern writings, is said to have spread over the millennia across the entire surface of the Earth, with huge centres under the Sahara, under the Matto Grosso mountains and under Mount Santa Catarina in Brazil, under Yucatan in Mexico, under Mount Shasta in California, in England, Egypt, the Czech Republic and Slovakia.

Hitler hoped to find the entrances to the underground kingdom of Agartha and to make contact with the descendants

Aryan "god-men" of Aldebaran-Hyperborea. In the legends and traditions of this underground kingdom, it is said, among other things, that there will be a devastating world war (the third) on our planet, which will end due to earthquakes and other natural disasters, including the reversal of the poles, which will cause the death of two-thirds of humanity. After this "last" war, the various races from within the Earth will reunite with the survivors on the surface of the planet and usher in the millennial "Golden Age" (the Age of Aquarius).

Hitler wanted to create an "Agartha" or "Ariana" on the surface of the Earth with the Aryan master race, and this place was to be Germany. During the Third Reich, two major SS expeditions took place in the Himalayas to find the entrances to the underground kingdom. Other expeditions took place in the Andes, in the Matto Grosso and Santa Catarina mountains in Brazil, in Czechoslovakia and in England. Some claimed that the people of Thule believed that, regardless of the system of tunnels and underground cities, the Earth was hollow, with large entrances, one at the North Pole and another at the South Pole. They referred to the laws of nature: the microcosm and the macrocosm. Whether it was a blood cell, a cell in the body or a core and a cavity surrounded by a

"corona radiata", life therefore takes place inside. The people of Thule concluded that the Earth must therefore be constituted according to the same principle. Even the druzes confirm this, as they are rocky cavities that have a life of their own, i.e. minerals and crystals, found inside inside.

Consequently, the Earth could also be hollow, which would correspond to the statements of the Tibetan lamas and the Dalai Lama, and it should have a core, a central sun that gives its interior a regular climate and permanent sunlight.

The secret Vril society!

In 1871, Edward Bulwer Lytton created the concept of Vril in his novel "S.F." (n.r. S.F. = shocking truth for people) – The Coming Race. Vril is a Tibetan word that can be translated as vital force, life force or vital energy, but also as vibration. Elena Blavatschi took this concept and used it in her occult and theosophical theories. Ancient civilisations considered Vril to be the highest form of energy in the Universe, with all other types of energy being merely secondary manifestations of this supreme force. Vril energy has a stronger concentration in certain places on the planet, called "energy vortexes".

North of the equator, the vortex rotates counterclockwise, and south of the equator, it rotates clockwise. In 1919, members of a group that continued the Templar Order set up the Vril organisation (German: Vril Gesellschaft) based in Ramsau, Germany (near the Austrian border). Members of the Vril Society came into contact with members of the Thule Society (Thule Gesellschaft), which was the origin of the Nazi party. Some members of the Thule organisation later became important figures in the Nazi party.

Almost all accounts of the Thule Society, as it is called in German, consider Baron Rudolf von Sebottendorff to be its founder. There is no doubt that von Sebottendorff was involved in the creation of this secret society. Several members claim that the second co-founder of the society was Karl Haushofer and that he was in fact the main founder, although he preferred to maintain a certain discretion about this.

The entire story revolves around this little-known figure: Karl Haushofer. At the beginning of the century, Haushofer was a military attaché in Tokyo, and his language skills helped him lay the foundations for the future Axis. In addition, he spent a long period in Tibet, where he became a member of the Bon priesthood. Also known as the Yellow Robes of Tibet, the Bon community was a shamanistic religion that preceded the emergence of Tibetan Buddhism and is considered to be the source of all Tibetan religions.

Haushofer also had a distinguished military career. His prophetic abilities as a general remained legendary during the First World War, helping him to win battles. While commanding his troops on the front lines, he was never wounded and managed to deploy his soldiers with remarkable precision in the midst of the most chaotic situations. He was a highly decorated and much admired military man. Rudolph Hess, who would become deputy leader of the Nazi party, served under General Haushofer and was very impressed by his genius.

After the First World War, Haushofer began to put into practice the directives he had received in Tibet (spiritually or naturally). After obtaining his doctorate, just before the outbreak of the First World War, Dr. Haushofer inaugurated a new subject called Geopolitics.

Rudolph Hess sought out the former general whom he had admired so much in the past and became a passionate student of the new subject. It is said that Hess was completely enchanted by his teacher's intellectual and occult abilities.

occult abilities of his teacher. In October 1918, a certain Adolf Schicklgruber (Hitler was his mother's maiden name) made a name for himself with his oratory skills. Rudolph Hess heard him speak and was very impressed. He was convinced that he was dealing with either a messiah or a madman, but he was not yet sure which category to place him in.

Hess recognised Hitler's great leadership qualities and introduced him to Haushofer. The three became friends. Haushofer was so impressed by him that he decided to make him a German messiah. Hitler was sentenced to nine months in prison after the 1923 episode, and Hess affirmed his loyalty by returning to Germany and agreeing to share a cell with him. Haushofer visited them during this period and probably contributed at least one chapter to Hitler's seminal work, Mein Kampf. When Hitler was released from prison, Haushofer taught him how to dress and behave, practically paving the way for his success.

Meanwhile, the Vril Society grew and was renamed the Vril-Gesellschaft, integrating three other important societies in Germany: – The Lords of the Black Stone, an offshoot of the Teutonic Order created in 1917, – The Black Knights, a branch of the Thule Society, and – The Black Sun, later identified with Heinrich Himmler's SS elite.

The Order of the Black Sun: the elite lodge of the Third Reich!

The Black Sun (a society that originally bore the name DHvSS – Die Herren Vom Schwarten Stein) was a secret organisation within the Thule Society, holding supremacy over the others. The SS was originally created as a unit to protect Hitler long before it became a military unit. I believe that absolutely all high-ranking SS officers can be included on the list of members of the "Black Sun", the SS being more than an elite military organisation, a veritable cult. Anyone who studies Nazi history quickly realises that the two concepts, Thule and the Black Sun, are at the centre of Nazi power.

Traditionally, "SS" is translated as Schutzstaffel, which means guard detachment. In reality, "SS" comes from Schwarze Sonne, which means Black Sun in German. This does not mean that every soldier who wore an SS uniform was a member of the Schwarze Sonne, but that the SS runes displayed everywhere had a secret meaning, referring to the Black Sun. As a general rule, very little is known about the Black Sun, but the concept of Thule can be found in many languages and cultures.

Maria Orsic

While the Thule Society ended up focusing primarily on a materialistic and political agenda, the Vril Society focused from the outset on the "world beyond" (transcendental aspects).

It is possible that the Vril Society would not have achieved the same level of success had it not been for a medium named Maria Orsic. Maria Orsitsch was born in Vienna on 31 October 1895. Her father, Tomislav, was an immigrant from Zagreb, and her mother, Sabiene Orsic, was from Vienna. In her youth, Maria Orsic joined the German nationalist movement that wanted Austria to join Germany. In 1919, she moved to Munich, where she came into contact with the Thule and Vril societies. Maria Orsitsch, Traute Lafrenz, Sigrun, Gudrun and Heike are said to have been very beautiful and to have had long hair, a sign that would become distinctive for members of the Vril society. These women also possessed supernatural powers that allowed them to come into contact with certain entities or extraterrestrial beings.

Thanks to her exceptional mediumistic abilities, Maria was quickly put in touch with members of the secret Thule society and soon afterwards she created her own circle together with Traute A. and other friends in Munich, forming the so-called Alldutsche Gesellschaft für Metaphysik, which was the first official name of the Vril society. For identification purposes, the members of the organisation (Vrilerinnen) wore a disc bearing the images of two of the five female mediums: Maria and Sigrun.

In December 1919, a secret meeting was organised between prominent members of the three main esoteric societies active in Germany at the time (Thule, Vril and the Black Sun) in a cabin near Berchtesgaden. On that occasion, Maria Orsic showed those present the transcripts of telepathic messages she had received in a secret language of the ancient German Knights Templar, which was completely unknown to her.

Maria Orsic presented two sets of transcriptions of messages received during trance states: the first was in the secret language of the Templars, and the second set of messages was written in an intelligible language, which she suggested could be an ancient Eastern language. It soon became apparent that this second set of telepathically transmitted information was in Sumerian. The message was translated with the help of the mysterious female medium from the Vril Society, who was known only as Sigrun. She also helped to decipher the mental images perceived by Maria Orsic, which described a circular flying ship.

At first glance, we might be tempted to believe that this flying machine technology greatly interested the Nazis. In reality, Hitler was much more concerned with conventional weapons, whose effects could be proven in a relatively short period of time. It is said that any technology that took more than a year to test was rejected by Hitler... at least that is the official version.

Aliens from Aldebaran!

In a trance session attended by some prominent members of the Thule Society, Maria Orsic spontaneously mediated contact with representatives of an extraterrestrial civilisation from the Aldebaran system, from whom she had received technical instructions for the construction of the interstellar ship.

According to Maria Orsic, the name of that extraterrestrial civilisation was Sumi, its members belonged to a humanoid race that colonised our planet for a short time approximately 500,000 years ago. According to the information transmitted in a trance state, she stated that the ancient ruins in Larsa, Shurruk and Nippur in Iraq were built by them. The survivors of the Flood later became the first Aryans, thus establishing a resonance with the members of the German societies of that time, which were based on the rudiments of the ideas and concepts of those ancient cultures.

The representatives of the Thule society who were in the room at the time were sceptical about Maria Orsic's revelations, expressing their disbelief and demanding further proof even while she was in a trance. The medium then began to write down strange symbols and characters that had never been seen before, which were later identified as belonging to ancient Sumerian writing, the precursor and source of the later Babylonian culture.

The existence of openings at the two poles is a reasonable hypothesis, as the centrifugal force during the formation of the Earth must have been much weaker here than in the rest of the Earth!

Researchers claim that after a latitude of 70-75 degrees north and south, the earth begins to curve, creating openings towards the interior of the earth. The transition is so smooth that sailors who accidentally entered these regions did not realise they were moving towards the interior of the Earth until they came across unknown regions that did not appear on the map.

The openings have an estimated diameter of 2,500 kilometres and are surrounded by a magnetic ring. They are almost constantly surrounded by clouds, and the airspace is restricted by law. When explorers searching for the North or South Pole reach this magnetic ring, their compasses point downwards and they believe that they are actually only in the magnetic ring surrounding the pole. The same researchers claim that the light and heat inside the Earth come from a central "sun". Marshall B. Gardner, one of the best-known proponents of the hollow Earth theory, believed that this "sun" was created by the hot core of the planet during its formation, as in Donati's image of a comet.

On the other hand, if we accept that the Earth is hollow, it follows that the other planets in our solar system are also hollow, since they obey the same laws. How many civilisations live inside these planets, while humans search for life only on their surface?

Current science cannot answer some questions

Other questions that supporters of the official line of thinking cannot answer are the following:

- 1. Why do icebergs form from fresh water, given that there should only be salt water at the poles? Where does all the vegetation found inside these icebergs come from?
- 2. Why do all explorers who have ventured beyond the Earth's magnetic poles claim that the weather is getting warmer and warmer and that the ice is beginning to disappear?
- 3. Why do certain animals and birds migrate north of the Arctic Circle in winter (e.g. moose)?

Conventional science cannot answer these questions, but proponents of the hollow Earth theory can.

There are rivers of fresh water flowing out of the Earth's interior. This fresh water, which carries fragments of vegetation and pollen with it, freezes, giving rise to freshwater icebergs in a region where only salt water should exist.

There are books that provide much more detailed evidence of the hollow interior of the Earth than I can provide in this paper. An excellent summary of this evidence can be found in the book by Dr. Raymond Bernard, which I highly recommend.

Admiral Richard Byrd: a source of information!

One of the famous journeys to the interior of the Earth was that of Admiral Richard E. Byrd, a well-known figure in the United States Navy. He flew "by mistake" to the interior of the Earth via the North Pole in 1947, a distance of 3,000 kilometres beyond the magnetic pole, and to the South Pole in 1956, a distance of 4,000 kilometres beyond the magnetic pole.

He named the land he discovered "that wonderful continent that appeared out of nowhere" and "the land of all mysteries." In 1947, Byrd and his passengers radioed that they were flying towards the interior of the planet, seeing how the ice was gradually being replaced by land, lakes and mountains covered with trees.

They described the existence of strange animals resembling mammoths and landforms that do not appear on any map of the Earth. After the initial publicity, all information about Byrd's expedition was censored, and the explorer died in 1957, only one year after his trip to Antarctica.

Two years later, in December 1959, the editor of Flying Saucers magazine, Ray Palmer, published an issue recounting Admiral Byrd's discoveries, but when the truck arrived from the printer, he discovered that his magazine was missing. Palmer called the printer, but was told that they had not received any delivery order for his publication.

When he asked them to reprint the edition, he was told that the printing plates were damaged and that this was no longer possible (what cheap excuses). Palmer believed that UFOs do not come from outer space, but from the centre of the Earth, and that this explains the unfortunate fate of that edition of his magazine.

Personally, I think he might be right, and it is not out of the question that the ancient Indian epic Ramayana describes the arrival of Rama as an emissary of Agartha in a flying saucer.

Legends about a ruling race inside the Earth, made up of blond, blue-eyed people, are found in all ancient cultures, including China, Tibet, Egypt, India, Europe, the Americas, and Scandinavia.

In his book, Paradise Regained, or the Cradle of the Human Race, William E. Warren suggests that humans originated from a tropical continent in the Arctic region, a land where the sun never sets and where a race of gods lived for more than a thousand years without ageing. Warren believes that this ancient land is the same as Hyperborea, which the ancient Greeks spoke of.

The Eskimos, whose origins may lie with the peoples of the Earth's interior, have legends that speak of a paradise island to the north, a wonderful land where the sun never sets, where there is no darkness but also no glaring light, a place where people live for thousands of years in peace and harmony. We find the same myth among the Irish.

Legend has it that during the great geological cataclysm and floods that occurred on the surface of the earth, the Lemurians and Atlanteans took refuge inside the earth. Plato speaks of the existence of "wider or narrower tunnels that connected Atlantis with the interior of the earth".

He also describes the great leader who "lives in the centre, in the navel of the earth... the one who explains the religions of all humanity".

The Roman writer Gaius Plinius Secundus, better known as Pliny, also refers to the people inside the Earth who fled Atlantis, as well as to legends about underground dwellers called "troglodytes" who hid an ancient treasure in their tunnels. Stories of this kind abound in all cultures.

There is countless evidence that the Earth is hollow and that advanced civilisations live inside it! These themes are found throughout human history, especially in the traditions and cultures of antiquity!

Today, people have become such puppets of those who govern them that they are willing to ridicule anyone who tries to convince them that the inside of the Earth is hollow. After all, doesn't this contradict what those intelligent scientists say? Yes, just as the statement that the Earth is round and not flat contradicted them in the past.

Anyone who analyses this subject realises how flimsy are the arguments of the scientists who try to establish their indisputable "reality".

They have only been able to penetrate a few kilometres into the earth's crust, and their theories about the centre of the planet are – as the name suggests – mere theories.

A few questions are enough to make the officially accepted line of thinking collapse like a house of cards. For example, the rotational movement of the planet around its axis gives rise to a centrifugal force that throws matter outwards, just like the spin cycle of a washing machine, which always remains empty in the centre.

How could this matter have remained in the centre of the planet when it was in a gaseous and then liquid state before solidifying? This conclusion is contrary to all logic and all laws of physics.

Researchers of the "hollow Earth" concept claim that the crust of our planet is no more than 1,500 kilometres thick. The rest of the Earth's centre is hollow. People can live just as well on the opposite side of the Earth's crust as we do on its surface.

If you wonder how this is possible, consider that people living in Australia do not fall off the Earth, even though they live upside down compared to those in the northern hemisphere. The force that keeps them on the Earth is gravity. This works just as well for those who live inside the Earth. The force of gravity pulls people towards the mass of matter, which is equally true for those who live on the surface of the Earth and inside it.

The centre of gravity is not the centre of the planet, but is located about 750 kilometres below the surface of the crust, i.e. halfway through it, acting equally on both sides.

This is how some researchers believe the interior of our planet looks. It is hollow in the centre, with a central sun and water flowing between the two polar openings.

The force of gravity is the same on both sides of the crust, attracting particles of matter equally towards the central mass.

The interior of the Earth!

Among other things, the Nazis believed that the Earth was hollow and that the entrances to its interior were located at the poles. Various researchers claim that they even created an underground base in Antarctica towards the end of the war, which continues to operate today. Given the evidence we have seen, I have no doubt that the Earth is hollow inside, or at least that there are large spaces inside our planet where highly advanced civilisations live.

In a way, we can say that there are three categories of people living on our planet. The writer Jules Verne was a high-ranking initiate of the network of secret societies, with connections to the Theosophical Society, the Golden Dawn and the Order of the Eastern Templars.

That is why he knew much more than the general public. Many of his science fiction novels were based on real events.

For example, he described the two moons of Mars as early as 1877, before they were identified by astronomers (officially). Even his famous novel, Journey to the Centre of the Earth, is not entirely fiction. He knew that, in essence, the story was true. Supporters of the idea that the Earth is hollow claim that the oceans drain into the Earth's interior through the poles, forming a huge sea at its centre, above which a central sun shines, providing the light and heat necessary for life.

I recently rewatched the film based on Jules Verne's novel and noticed that the centre of the Earth is imagined in the same way. I find it interesting that the only obstacles faced by Jules Verne's heroes are giant reptiles found in the sunken city of Atlantis.

There is speculation (supported by a great deal of evidence) that dinosaurs survived the cataclysm 65 million years ago by taking refuge inside the Earth, particularly near the South Pole. One of those who suggested this possibility is paleontologist Tom Rich, who works at the Victoria Museum in Australia and who discovered fossils of a polar dinosaur in 1987 in a tunnel dug in the south of the state of Victoria, in a place known as Dinosaur Bay.

As a high-ranking insider, Jules Verne knew these things.

That is why his "fiction" novels (like many other literary works and films based on them) express much more truth than we might be tempted to believe. A telling example of this are Steven Spielberg's films, especially those in the Indiana Jones series, but also Jurassic Park, in which scientists manipulate DNA to create reptilian dinosaurs.

My own belief is that human DNA has been used to create reptilian-human bloodlines.

Sketch of Donati's comet made in 1853, showing how the disintegrated mass of matter is thrown out by centrifugal force, ending up "spinning in orbit" around a central source of energy.

In this way, the interior remains empty, just like clothes in a washing machine's spin cycle, which gather on the outside, leaving the inside empty. Could the same process have happened when the Earth was formed?

Agartha – The Civilisation in the Centre of the Earth!

It always amazes me that although things we have been taught to be true later turn out to be false, some of us remain "stuck" on the old, wrong idea. Most of us accept as true the things we are taught, simply because everyone else believes them.

If you dare to "go against the grain," if you question the veracity of officially trumpeted axioms, you will most often be labelled with specific epithets. For example, if you stray from religious norms, you are called a "sectarian"; if you have a different opinion from the official one about the scientific order, you are categorised as a "dreamer" – in the best case; if you disagree with political views, you become an extremist, a neo-Nazi, a communist; our society has a label for every type of non-conformity.

Science tells us where the North and South Poles are: where all the meridians meet at a single point, i.e. at the pole. And yet, isn't it curious that no expedition has ever managed to reach the poles? By studying samples of the Earth's crust taken from different depths, we can say that the mantle is solid – at least to a certain depth.

We also know that the temperature of the Earth's inner layers increases with depth – at least to the level that has been reached. That is why we all assume that the Earth is solid, even in its centre. Please note: we assume.

Today, it is assumed that the formation of planets invariably leads to this model of a "solid planet," like a solid sphere. Astronomers and physicists believe that gases gradually condense until they reach the form of a solid sphere. However, there are other possibilities. I bet you don't know them.

A simple study of centrifugal force could teach us all a new way in which the Earth was formed. We all agree that the planet rotates on its axis (this is how days and nights follow each other). Cate Malone, author of an interesting article entitled "The Hollow Earth" (in the sense that it is not solid), shows that "centrifugal force determines the slightly flattened shape (at the poles) of the planet" (which is therefore not a perfect sphere).

To see how the planet was formed, let's look at a washing machine with a spin cycle. The laundry in the spin cycle (which for the future planet is actually gases and solid and liquid particles) is thrown outwards so that the centre remains empty. The centre does not move.

Just as the Earth has never stopped rotating, this washing machine never stops spinning. So what happens to all the laundry in the spin cycle if the machine never stops? Will it rush towards the centre to fill the void? Never. It will continue to remain at the periphery, and the centre will remain empty.

Many peoples still preserve legends about beings living inside the Earth in their folklore, as is the case with the large paradise islands of the north present in Scandinavian folk customs, or stories about elves, trolls, dwarves and giants in Russian and Eskimo folklore.

All this shows us that the idea of a hollow Earth is not new at all. In 1909, the Eskimo guides used by Admiral Peary on his expedition believed that the purpose of the journey was to discover the "great people" of the north, from whom they were descended. There are countless anomalies or strange situations in all the records of the first explorers who ventured into the Arctic or Antarctic.

Most of those who set out for the north in the 19th century describe seas of fresh water and a warmer climate with normal temperatures as they advanced towards the pole. There are also references to dust clouds, large areas of snow where they found pollen, birds and animals migrating north for the winter, and in ice blocks they found vegetation and even mammals – considered extinct (such as the mammoth) – frozen.

Even icebergs are anomalies because they are made of fresh water in areas where rainfall is less than 5 cm per year. The discoveries made by Dr. Frederick Cook and Admiral Peary in 1908 and 1909 were considered inconclusive. It could not be proven that either of them reached the North Pole.

As Dr. Raymond Bernard states in his book "The Hollow Earth"[3], such confirmation is truly impossible. It is already known to everyone that the magnetic poles do not coincide with the geographic poles. If the Earth were solid, then they would coincide.

This obvious difference between the magnetic and geographic poles can't be explained by the solid Earth model, which sees the Earth as a solid sphere. But it makes sense if we think about the polar openings (real holes in the planet's crust) that let the magnetic poles be somewhere near the edge of these openings, like they actually are.

This obvious difference between the magnetic and geographic poles cannot be explained by the model of the Earth as a solid sphere. However, the explanation becomes clear if we consider the existence of polar openings (actual holes in the planet's crust) that make it possible for the magnetic poles to be located somewhere towards the edge of these openings, as is the case in reality.

In the image on the right (taken by the ESSA-7 satellite on 23 November 1968), the opening at the North Pole (in the centre of the image) is clearly visible. Bernard states that the reason why no one has ever reached the North or South Pole is simple. "The magnetic and geographic poles do not coincide because the geographic poles are located 'in space' and not on the surface of the planet." This is due to the openings at the poles.

Shambala – a place in the centre of the Earth identical to Agartha!

In Tibetan Buddhist and Indian Buddhist traditions, Shambala or Shambhala (also spelled Shamballa; Tibetan: བཏུལ་ཁྱེད་@ཏུལ་; Wylie: bde 'byung, pron. De-jung) is a mythical kingdom hidden somewhere in the interior of Asia. It is mentioned in various ancient texts, including the Kalachakra Tantra, as well as in ancient texts of the Zhang Zhung culture that preceded Tibetan Buddhism in western Tibet. The Bön scriptures speak of a land called Olmolungring.

Regardless of its historical basis, Shambhala gradually came to be seen as a purely Buddhist land, a fabulous kingdom whose reality is as visionary or spiritual as it is physical or geographical. This was the form in which the myth of Shambhala reached the West, where it influenced Buddhist spiritual seekers as well as non-Buddhists; and, to some extent, it influenced popular culture in general.

Shambhala is, according to some mystical authors, a secret centre from which our planet is governed. The term is already known in Eastern tradition. This mystical centre is said to be hidden somewhere in the interior of Asia or not even on Earth, but in an invisible parallel world. From that secret dimension, the beings of Shambhala can see what is happening on our planet and can intervene in certain critical situations to help any human being or to correct the destiny of the planet for the better.

The amazing adventures of Admiral Richard Byrd, who reached the centre of the Earth in search of the Nazis, whom he found!

The most recent expeditions that went beyond the magnetic poles and were made public were led by Admiral Richard E. Byrd (of the US Navy) in 1947 and 1956. Like the other expeditions led by Byrd (in the 1930s), these remained shrouded in mystery. In his logbook and radio communications with his crew, Admiral Byrd stated in 1947 that he had reached another world beyond the geographic North Pole.

During the 1956 Antarctic expedition, various radio stations in the US reported that "on 13 January, several members of the American team made a 4,320 km flight from McMurdo Sound (640 km west of the South Pole) and flew over an area 3,680 km beyond the pole". And on 13 March 1956, Byrd publicly stated that "this expedition has discovered a new land".

Many Americans remember with excitement the press statements following Admiral Byrd's expeditions. Crowned the world's greatest explorer, Byrd's statements about the new land aroused great public interest. But just as quickly, all information about Byrd disappeared. There was no further comment on the radio, so that before long the subject disappeared from public attention. Had Admiral Byrd really discovered a new land? A land that would confirm a different view of the planet from the official one?

Excerpt from Admiral Byrd's diary!

This is a transcription of the diary found on an audio tape and was obtained from the Hollow Earth Society in Australia. For more information, I recommend Tim R. Swartz's book, Admiral Byrd's Secret Journey Beyond the Pole.

"I must write these lines in secret and without light. This is about my flight to the Arctic on 19 February 1947. There are situations when a man must accept the concealment of the truth. I am not free to make public the following account that I am now writing. It will probably never reach the public eye, but I must do my duty so that someone may read these lines when the time comes. Let us hope that the greed of those who exploit others will not stand in the way of the truth."

Logbook – Arctic camp, 19 February 1947!

Below, everywhere, only ice and snow. I notice a slight yellowish colouration. It is dispersed in a linear pattern. I change my flight direction to get a better view of this colouration. There is also a reddish-purple hue to the ice.

We circled the area twice and returned to our original direction. I checked the plane's position again at base camp. I relayed my concern about the strange shades of snow beneath me. Both the magnetic compass and the gyroscope are starting to shake and wobble. We can no longer navigate using the flight instruments.

I measure the direction using the optical compass (according to the sun) and everything seems fine. The control levers respond very slowly to commands and move very slowly. However, there is no more ice visible. Mountains can be seen in the distance. We have been flying for 29 minutes and now the mountains are clearly visible; it is not an illusion.

I have never seen mountains like this before; they are very small. I change altitude to 900 metres. I encounter strong turbulence again. We pass over the small mountains and continue north. Beyond the mountains, I can see a small river. A valley with a river running through it. There shouldn't be any green valleys here. There's something wrong with this whole picture. We should only see ice and snow. From the side, we can see forests on the mountain slopes. The instruments are going crazy. The gyroscope is spinning back and forth without any pattern.

I reduce the altitude to 425 metres and make a short turn to the left to get a better view of the valley below me. It is green and covered with thick grass. The light here seems different. The sun is no longer visible. We make another turn to the left and set our sights on a large animal in the valley. It looks like an elephant. No, it looks more like a mammoth. It's incredible, and yet it's right here. I lower the altitude to 300 metres and take out my binoculars to get a better look at the animal. It's clear – it's a mammoth. I report this to base camp.

"I come across even more green hills. The outside thermometer shows a temperature of 23 degrees Celsius. We continue our flight. Now the navigation systems seem to be working. I can't believe it! I try to contact base camp. The radio isn't working. The landscape is much flatter than normal. Ahead of us, we see what looks like a city! This is impossible!!!"

"The plane seems very light and is shaking. The navigation system refuses to work. My God, strange ships are approaching from the side and from behind! They are disc-shaped and seem to be emitting something. They are so close that I can see their insignia!"

"It's a type of swastika. Fantastic! Where are we actually? What happened? I'll check the navigation system again. It's still not responding. We're trapped in some kind of invisible net. There are crackling noises coming from the radio, followed by a voice in English with a slight northern or German accent. The message is: 'Welcome to our domain, Admiral. We will land you in exactly seven minutes. Relax, you're in good hands.'"

"I realise that our plane's engines have stopped. The plane is being controlled from outside and is now turning. The landing phase is beginning and the plane is descending as if in an invisible lift. Upon touching the ground, the plane barely shudders. I make one last entry in this logbook. Several men are approaching the plane. They are tall and have blond hair. In the distance, a city can be seen pulsing with rainbow-coloured rays of light."

"I don't know what will happen now, but I don't see any weapons on those approaching us. I hear a voice calling my name (with a German accent) and asking me to open the aircraft hatch. I obey."[4]

This is where Admiral Byrd's diary ends. What follows is what [Admiral Byrd] recounted from memory, as he did not write the rest of his experience in his diary – and you will see why.

In short, here is what happened next:

1. Byrd and his radio operator, who was with him on the plane, were taken and driven to the bright city that seemed to be made of crystal.
2. Upon arrival, the two were separated and Byrd was taken to meet the "Master," who informed him that he had arrived in the "world within" and that he should not be afraid—they would later take him back to the surface of the planet.
3. The "Master" told Byrd: "You aroused our interest when you detonated the first atomic bombs in Hiroshima and Nagasaki in Japan. At that very alarming moment, we sent our flying vehicles (flugelrads – German) to the surface of the planet to see what you had done." He went on to talk about 1945 and said that they tried to meet with the Americans but were met with hostility. Every time they tried, the Americans fired at them and attacked their vehicles.
4. The "master" explained that "we have no future if we continue with this atomic madness... and that there is no answer in our weapons, no certainty in our science, and that when the great war breaks out, there will be no flowers left on earth and all human cities will be levelled, everything in utter chaos."
5. After this discussion about man-made cataclysms, Byrd said goodbye to the "Master" and returned to the plane with his assistant. They were immediately taken to the surface of the planet in the same way they had been brought there. However, they had a very clear warning message about the path of humanity. A message for us.

The amazing adventures of Admiral Byrd, who reached the centre of the Earth!

He was defeated by members of the Black Sun of New Germany in the final offensive of the Allies.

Admiral Byrd flew to the Centre of the Earth for approximately 13 hours!

The message Byrd received from the Nazis in the Centre of the Earth:

"Leave us alone and return to your base. If you wish to visit our base with friendly intentions, we will welcome you, of course, in peace. For we are no longer your enemies. Our aircraft and weapons are superior to yours, and I would advise you not to fire on us. If you want to fight us, you have no chance. Must I remind you that you are now in territory controlled by New Germany? You are, in effect, in our airspace."

Commander Byrd listened but did not respond. When the German finished, Byrd gave the order: "Fire at will!" No sooner had the order been carried out than the sky seemed to explode. The Falcon aircraft that were hit by the laser beams from the flying saucers crashed, killing the crews instantly. From camouflaged anti-aircraft guns, red beams as thin as pencils were fired continuously. An American witness, whose plane had been hit by one such beam, said: 'The beam pulled us down. Our pilot lost control of the aircraft. We had to fly down. Those who could, jumped out with their parachutes.'

Admiral Byrd had to watch his entire escort crash. Suddenly, the German commander's voice was heard again over the loudspeaker: 'Commander Byrd, you are crazy. You have sacrificed your own men. We warned you. Leave this country immediately and never come back.' Byrd was in shock. Miller took control of the aircraft and turned towards freedom. Byrd had fulfilled his order to find the Germans. He had entered the den of young lions, but he was no Daniel.

The scene that followed, as the American planes fell to the ground, did not resemble a forced landing on enemy territory. The American survivors, who were captured by the Germans, were interrogated in 1977 to confirm the German version of events. The Germans immediately began a rescue operation. Some of the American planes were not so badly damaged, and the crews were able to escape easily. They surrendered to the Germans, were disarmed and told that they were not dealing with enemies.

The Germans quickly extinguished the fire and tried to free some of the crew members who were still trapped. Twenty-six Americans survived. They were treated by doctors and paramedics, while ambulances took them to the nearest hospitals in Neu-Berlin (the capital of the Germans in the Centre of the Earth). At the hospitals, their wounds were stitched up, fractures were set, etc. Everything possible was done to ensure that the Americans were well cared for. Those crew members who had not suffered serious injuries were brought into the city.

It seems that the Third Reich never actually surrendered, only the German Wehrmacht under the leadership of Donitz. As for the Wehrmacht, it had signed a ceasefire agreement, but not a peace treaty. As you will see, the ceasefire agreement was repeatedly violated by the Allies in 1946-47 and 1958, when they launched operations "High Jump" (1946-1947)

"International Geophysical Year" (1957-1958). Therefore, the state of war between the Illuminati and the members of the German Reich, respectively the members of the "Black Sun", still exists today!

It therefore appears that the German Reich continues to exist today, just as well as it did then, and that the current governments of Poland, Austria and the Federal Republic of Germany are nothing more than viable substitute governments, either until a peace treaty is concluded by the real leadership of the Reich (not by Chancellor Kohl or Angela Merkel), or until the German Reich fully regains its rights. At least that is what the Federal Constitutional Court in Karlsruhe decided, most recently on 31 July 1973:

"The Constitution – not just a thesis of international law and state law – starts from the idea that the German Reich survived the collapse of 1945 and that it didn't disappear after the surrender, or because of a foreign power taking over through occupation forces, or even after that. This reality results from the preamble, according to Articles 16, 23, 116 and 146 of the Constitution. The same reality corresponds to the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court, which the Senate respects.

The German Reich continues to exist (Constitutional Court 2,226 (277); 3,288 (3190); 5,85 (126); 6,309, 336, 363), it retains its legal power as before, but lacking organisational form and, in particular, institutionalised organs, it does not have the power to act as a unitary state.

Such an assessment by the Constitutional Court can obviously only be based on the fact that the Allies have not yet succeeded in defeating the Third Reich (in fact, they did not even want to). This is especially true if we consider the continuation of the German rule of law, as the successor to the Reich, in Antarctica (600,000 square kilometres) and Argentina (a German colony above San Carlos de Bariloche, 10,000 square miles = larger than half of Switzerland).

11 March 1947 – new developments!

After Byrd returned to the United States, he described (as he did after every mission) what had happened during the trip and added the following to his diary: "I just met with a team from the Pentagon. I presented my discovery and the message I received from the 'Master'. Everything was recorded. They contacted the President. I have been detained for several hours now. Six hours and 39 minutes, to be exact. I am being intensely interrogated by hostile forces and a medical team. It's a nightmare. I am being held under strict surveillance in accordance with the highest international security regulations of the United States. I have been ordered not to disclose anything from the message I received from 'The Master'. Unbelievable! I have been reminded that I am a member of the military and that I must obey orders."

24 December 1956

"The years since 1947 have not been good. This is the last entry in this diary. In closing, I must say that throughout all these years I have kept the message I received secret, as ordered, even though it was against my values and morals. Now I sense a long night coming for me, but this secret will not die with me, it will triumph, as truth always triumphs. It is the only hope for humanity. I saw it with my own eyes, and it set me free. I have done my duty to this monstrous military-industrial complex. From now on, the long night of Arctic truth will come to an end, the bright sun of truth will rise again, and all those who are in darkness will fail in their plans. For I have seen with my own eyes that land beyond the poles, the centre of the great unknown." Admiral Richard E. Byrd, United States Navy. Was the North Pole reached?

An essential part of the Hollow Earth theory is the absence of the North Pole. It is not a point on the surface, but an entire sea of warm water that gradually leads into the interior of the Earth. This statement may seem very "cheeky" statement, and you may not like it at all, but let's look at some evidence to support it.

The first thing to note is that compasses go haywire beyond the Arctic Circle. The most humble and renowned Norwegian explorer, Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, lost confidence in his instruments on his expedition to the North Pole and admitted that he had no idea where he was the whole time.

February 1895

After disembarking from the Fram, Nansen headed north – to reach the pole – with a sled full of supplies and later returned via Spitzbergen, passing through Franz Josef Land. From 29 March 1895 until the spring of 1896, Nansen was completely disoriented!

He admitted that after travelling through the very cold regions, the weather changed and became much warmer. More specifically, the temperature rose with the new gusts of wind coming from the north. He said that at one point the sun became unbearably strong! Nansen took sound measurements of the water and discovered that the water was getting warmer at depth.

Where did this warm water come from? He encountered animals that, according to modern science, had no business being there. On 22 April 1895, Nansen wrote: "I was very surprised yesterday morning when I saw the tracks of an animal in the snow. It was a fox, and it was heading east. The tracks were fresh. What was a fox doing here? There were clear signs that it was not lacking food.

Were we near the shore? I looked around, but it had been foggy all day and it's possible we were close to the shore without seeing it. In any case: a warm-blooded mammal – at 85 degrees latitude! Before we moved on, we came across another fox track leading in the same direction as the first. I can't figure out what these animals feed on here, they probably learned to fish for crustaceans in the pools of water. But why would they stray so far from the coast? That's what intrigues me the most. Have they gone mad? I don't think so."

Another source of information is Marshall B. Gardner, who wrote "A Journey to the Centre of the Earth," in which he quotes Dr. Nansen about the Eskimos.

Here is what Nansen says:

"The Eskimos say they came from inside the Earth, but they could not name the exact place when asked by the Norwegians where they came from."

Gardner quotes from Nansen's second volume, "In the North-West Passage": "I have already said that the Norwegian name Skraeling given to the Eskimos was probably used at first to designate fairies or mythical creatures. Moreover, when the Icelanders came across the Eskimos in Greenland, they called them trolls, which is an old term for various supernatural beings."

A Norwegian story!

Willis George Emerson recounts a Norwegian story in his autobiography, The Smoke God. It is about two fishermen, a father and son, who were fishing in their boat in the North Sea. A violent storm drove them to the edge of the North Pole. It was 1829.

For two years, Olaf Jansen (the son) recounts that they lived inside the Earth with the inhabitants of those lands, who were kind and courteous, 3.5 metres tall. Jansen then said that they left the interior of the Earth through the southern opening. The name of the book comes from the fact that Olaf described the interior sun as having a diffuse appearance.

The complete picture!

A complete and accurate description of our planet is therefore as follows: the planet Earth is like a balloon, like an empty ball inside, which has two polar openings with a diameter of 2,300 km (located in the north and south) and which have curved edges that make it possible to pass from one surface to the other, just as an ant does when it passes from one side of a leaf to the other. The thickness of the planetary wall varies between 1,100 and 1,300 km, being greater towards the poles. At the centre is an inner sun with a diameter of 1,300 km that spreads a diffuse light.

Let us examine the accompanying photographs, which were taken by satellites at different times. The North Pole area is marked on both images with a red rectangle. The polar opening is clearly visible and cannot be confused with cloud formations because it is constantly present in the same area and in the same shape in both photographs. This very rare evidence, which has managed to escape the strict control imposed by those in power, shows that the Earth is actually hollow.

This truth can no longer be hidden.

Many things support this truth. For example, when a team of British reporters and cameramen from the BBC were scheduled to visit Antarctica, they encountered a series of problems. Although the original plan, carefully drawn up well in advance, included a direct flight from South Africa to Antarctica (which also included a flyover of the so-called "Inaccessible Zone"), they had to make some last-minute changes.

They were forced to travel to South America first. Once there, they discovered that the only commercial flight to Antarctica was operated by an American company, which transported groups of 20 to 30 people to the American base at McMurdo Station. However, these flights only operated during the summer months, and when they finally arrived at the base, the British were treated with hostility by the Americans!

Another interesting fact is that, due to the "lack of satellites" over Antarctica, all weather reports and forecasts for this area were made from the American McMurdo Station. This is a clear way of restricting information leaks and possible photographic evidence that a satellite over the South Pole could provide, as was the case with the opening of the North Pole.

But the American monopoly over Antarctica has gone even further. A recent agreement was signed between several interested countries not to start any geological or other exploration in Antarctica, including both minerals and oil.

Countless evidence also comes from Russia, where mammoth ivory is found almost constantly, especially in the extreme northern areas beyond the Arctic Circle. For hundreds of years, traders have been selling such "relics" that seem to abound in those areas. But this phenomenon is linked to another, perhaps even more astonishing one: entire mammoths have been found frozen in blocks of ice in Siberia and other regions beyond the Arctic Circle. Some of them still had tufts of green grass in their mouths.

There is evidence today that this wall of the Earth is not solid and full of matter as we are told, but rather resembles a piece of Parmesan cheese full of caves and interconnected underground tunnels, some of which lead to the inner world, to the interior of the Earth.

I cannot help but think of Jules Verne's famous story entitled "A Journey to the Centre of the Earth," written in 1864. It describes this so clearly that it seems as if the author knew these realities in detail. I must also mention here the striking similarity between Jules Verne's "From the Earth to the Moon" (1865) and the first American mission to the Moon (Apollo 11 – 1969).

The two events are so similar that they are almost identical, even though they took place more than a century apart; the data provided by the French author in his story coincide 99% with those of the American mission. Not to mention the amazing story "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea," which introduces the first submarine, the Nautilus.

Did Jules Verne have access to these truths? The coincidence hypothesis is out of the question. But that's not all. The San Andreas fault in California, USA, is the focus of attention and can provide us with some astonishing information. Since 1950, the American government has sent numerous missions to study the underwater topography of the west coast of the USA, focusing on California.

While mapping the area, the teams discovered that the Californian continental plate is lined with many huge caverns and passages, some so large that a submarine can navigate through them. After a while, it was discovered that some of them extended as far as Utah and Nevada! One of the nuclear submarines exploring the caverns was severely damaged and lost.

The most shocking information discovered on this occasion: most of California simply floats on the ocean, supported by a few natural "pillars" formed by these underwater caverns, and the San Andreas fault is the result of the collapse of some of these supporting pillars, which also causes earthquakes in the area.

For those who still believe the falsehoods repeated by official science, I offer the following questions:

1. Can it be proven that any explorer has reached the so-called North or South Poles?

2. If there is no parallel beyond latitude 86 (degrees), then how can anyone reach the pole (which is theoretically located at latitude 90 degrees)?
3. Why are northern winds getting warmer as you go further into the Arctic?
4. Why, beyond 83 degrees north latitude, is there open (unfrozen) sea and warm air currents?
5. Once the 82nd parallel is reached, why does the compass needle suddenly become agitated and useless?
6. Why do the warm air currents mentioned above bring more dust than any other similar current on Earth?
7. If there are no rivers flowing from the interior of the planet into the Arctic Ocean, why are there so many icebergs made of fresh water at the poles?
8. What is the explanation for the fact that tropical seeds and plants are found in these blocks of ice and in the water?
9. Why do millions of migratory birds and animals head north, beyond the Arctic Circle, during winter?
10. Why does the wind coming from the far north bring more pollen and flower petals than any other air current on Earth?
11. Why does this wind-borne pollen visibly colour the snow on large areas?

But Earth is not the only hollow celestial body. Numerous photographs of other planets and natural satellites (including the Moon) prove this through the shape and depth of craters formed by the impact of various meteorites. Moreover, some of them, visible as small black holes, are nothing more than passages and tunnels leading into the interior of the respective planets.

A whole series of studies have been conducted in this regard. It has been concluded that the most credible mathematical model for representing the structure of a planet is precisely this: planets are hollow inside. In fact, the recent earthquakes that resulted from the tragedy in Southeast Asia, caused by a 9.0 magnitude earthquake, demonstrate that the planet's walls are still vibrating and thus causing earthquakes in other areas.

Leonard Euler, the genius mathematician of the 18th century, demonstrated on the basis of a mathematical model that the Earth is hollow inside and that in the centre of this hollow space there is a small sun. Dr. Edmund Halley, the famous discoverer of the comet that bears his name, and Royal Astronomer in England in the 17th century, was convinced that the Earth is hollow. In the early 1820s, the American John Cleves Symmes failed to obtain government support for his expedition to the interior of the Earth. He expounded his ideas about the hollow Earth, claiming that the planet is inhabited inside and has two openings at the poles.

Recent photographs of Mars show that during the Martian summer, one of the polar caps shrinks significantly, while the other grows (due to winter). Some of the photographs show that the polar ice cap (during summer) shrinks so much that it reveals a circular black perimeter (edge), which is nothing more than the polar opening.

As expected, the inner sun of Mars provides a warmer climate there than on the planet's outer surface, so that compact masses of clouds form at the two polar openings due to the meeting of warm air from the interior and cold air from the exterior.

This explains the large variation in the polar ice caps of Mars throughout the Martian year

(which is twice as long as Earth's). Therefore, during the Martian summer, the polar cap disappears completely, and what can be seen is nothing more than a compact mass of clouds that does not completely cover the polar opening towards the interior of the planet and allows its edge to be seen.

Last but not least, the Northern Lights and Southern Lights are formed by the interaction of photonic particles emitted by the inner sun with the outer solar wind (sent by the Sun of our solar system) and reaching the polar region. This also explains the presence of auroras on other planets or satellites that do not have an atmosphere (such as the Moon). Indeed, polar auroras have been observed not only on Earth, but also on Mars, the Moon and Jupiter.

Below we will give a brief description of the inner world of the planet, as revealed by the testimonies of those who have been there!

The people there are proud of their superior mentality and knowledge, especially since they surpass us in creativity. They are very technologically advanced and have many simple and very useful inventions.

For example, they claim that their flying vehicles (which we call UFOs) use free energy, referring to the energy of space, which is present everywhere (unlike us, who use fuels concentrated in certain deposits as energy).

They are thousands of years ahead of us in science, art, painting and sculpture. Agriculture, health and other such fields are also completely different from ours, with them achieving exceptional results in this regard.

The inhabitants of the planet's interior claim that they live in complete harmony with each other, have everything they need, and that there is no poverty, police or war. They also say that they know every language on Earth and that the secrets of all our governments are well known to them.

They have lived there since before the Flood and claim that our Bible has been heavily altered by those who want to maintain their current power. They have advanced telepathic abilities and are descendants of the Atlantean civilisation. They advise us to completely abandon nuclear weapons.

They are able to prevent those who are insincere or want to take advantage of them from visiting them. However, as the current power on the surface is in the hands of militaristic and greedy governments, an official meeting with them in the near future is highly unlikely.

Compared to the inhabitants of the Earth's interior, we on the surface are barbarians, and our civilisation is nothing more than a state of mechanical barbarism. They have warned us that until we completely renounce war, nuclear weapons, poverty and the exploitation of man by man, until we achieve a society based on equity, truth and justice, we will not be worthy of contact with the inner world, which is on a much higher social, scientific and moral level than ours.

Now in search of Agartha...

The ancient writings of the Chinese, Egyptians, Indians and other peoples, as well as the legends of the Eskimos, speak of the great opening in the north and of an advanced people living in a mysterious country called Agartha. This is the general name that defines the world inside the Earth, as well as all the colonies, the capital being Shambala, located inside Mount Meru, in Tibet.

What is it like in Agartha?

The secret territory of Agartha has a population of 20 million souls; there are no prisons here, and police are provided by family heads. Millions of dwija (twice-born) and yogis live in suburbs symmetrically divided into underground constructions.

Above them is the Trinity: Brahatma, who is entrusted with Authority, Mahatma, who is entrusted with Power, and Mahanga, who is entrusted with Organisation.

Above the Trinity are 12 members of the Supreme Initiation, then another group of 22 people, representing the 22 principles of the Word, with which God created the world. Next come the 365 bagwanda (cardinals), named after the 365 days of the year.

Agartha was not always an underground empire.

Hundreds of years later, at the beginning of the 20th century, Ferdinand Ossendowski, a Russian writer of Polish origin, decided to undertake a dangerous journey in search of the mythical kingdom.

Agartha was not always an underground empire.

Hundreds of years later, at the beginning of the 20th century, Ferdinand Ossendowski, a Russian writer of Polish origin, decided to embark on a dangerous journey in search of the mythical kingdom.

After crossing arid plateaus and desolate areas, Ossendowski reached the banks of the Amur River, where he learned from some monks about the existence of a kingdom known as Agartha, whose inhabitants were all-powerful.

The monks led him deep underground, where the King of the World appears only on rare occasions to perform miracles or deliver prophecies. Here is what Ossendowski wrote in his book Animals, Men, Gods (1924): The kingdom of Agartha extends through underground tunnels to all parts of the world, and those who live here are under the authority of the King of the World.

The capital of Agartha is surrounded by cities where high priests live, and the palace of the King of the World is surrounded by temples where gurus live, who control the visible and invisible forces of the world and hold the power of life and death in their hands. In strange vehicles unknown to us, they are able to travel at incredible speeds through the underground tunnels that separate one city from another.

Agartha went underground 6,000 years ago. According to Ossendowski, Agartha was not always underground, becoming so 6,000 years ago in order to protect its wise men from the curiosity of a perverted world. According to his later theory, Ossendowski says that these territories should not be confused with those inside the Hollow Earth. According to his vision, there are two underground worlds, one located closer to the surface and the other inside the hollow Earth.

What did the Hollow Earth theory say?

The bold Hollow Earth theory was first developed by William Reed and presented in his book The Phantom of the Poles, published in 1906. This theory was later developed by Marshall B. Gardner in his work A Journey to the Centre of the Earth, published in 1920. The two Americans independently reached similar conclusions, claiming that a large population with a highly developed civilisation lives inside the Earth.

Openings leading to the interior of the Earth!

Based on a series of documents by William Reed, Marshall B. Gardner, Huguenin and Ray Palmer, as well as the revelation of Admiral Byrd, Bernard drew several conclusions, which at the time caused a great scandal:

- a) In reality, there is no North or South Pole, but only large openings leading to the hollow interior of the Earth;
- b) UFOs come from this hollow interior;
- c) The interior of the Earth is heated by a central sun, which is the source of the aurora borealis. The climate here is subtropical, neither cold nor hot;
- d) Polar explorers have seen with their own eyes that animals were moving north in search of food. They saw tropical birds and animals that normally need warmth, they saw butterflies and even mosquitoes.

Everything is connected to Agartha!

Of course, the list of unanswered questions could go on, but one thing is certain: all these explanations are connected to the legendary Tarim of the White Waters, to Agartha.

The Hollow Earth theory, which claims that there is a concavity inside the Earth, with the two poles as points of contact with the outer surface, may open up perspectives never before imagined, not even by the tireless explorers who set out in search of the mythical Agartha: that the civilisation to which we belong is not the only one on Earth.

Agartha – a shocking truth!

Although many of us find the idea of a hollow Earth rather ridiculous, given that scientifically based information is readily available to everyone today, the theory that explores this possibility dates back to ancient times and is not unique to any one civilisation.

The Hollow Earth theory was launched at the end of the last century. According to this theory, there is actually a concavity inside the Earth, which has seven points of contact with the outer surface, two of which are the two poles.

Thanks to images taken by NASA using ESSA space satellites, the polar openings can be seen:
– the northern opening, with a diameter of 1,400 miles; – the southern opening, with a diameter of 1,300 miles.

A huge ocean discovered inside the Earth...

It lies beneath East Asia and is the size of the Arctic Ocean... The discovery was made by Michael Wyssession, a seismologist at Washington State University in St. Louis, and Jesse Lawrence of the University of California, San Diego – unexplainedmysteries.com

As early as 1950, while mapping the area, US underwater topography research teams discovered that the Californian continental plate is lined with many huge caverns and passages; some are so large that a submarine can navigate through them. After a while, it was discovered that some of them extended under the states of Utah and Nevada! One of the nuclear submarines exploring the caverns was severely damaged and lost.

The most shocking information discovered on this occasion: most of California is simply floating on the ocean, supported by a few natural "pillars" formed by these underwater caverns, and the San Andreas fault is the result of the collapse of some of these support pillars, which also cause earthquakes in the area – banatulsarbesc.wordpress.com.

Brigadier General Dr. Emil Strainu, director of the Centre for Psychotronic and Ufological Studies, advisor to the Romanian Parliament on unconventional and asymmetric issues, states (in Adevar/Fictiune-January 7, 2010) the following:

"One of the greatest discoveries made this year, which is currently only being discussed in scientific circles, is that there are between three and five tunnels (a kind of flooded underground cave) under the American continent, crossing the South American continent from east to west and from west to east. Imagine leaving Los Angeles in a submarine and coming out in Florida without going around the Panama Canal.

- Their nature is not yet known. These channels are very large. A Trident submarine can easily travel through a single channel and, what's more, it can even encounter another one.
- It should be noted that currently and in the near future, we will be marked by a series of revelations about contact with hypothetical extraterrestrial civilisations. The opinion of certain advisors to important world governments, scientific advisors to UNESCO, the UN, the European Union and others is that all this information is merely preparing humanity for a recognition that will be evident and will occur in a very short period of time. In the last two or three years, I have seen films and pictures that are much more "spectacular" than those that have been released to the public, but which are not being circulated. I am referring to the film and pictures taken of the entrance to the South Pole from satellites. All countries that have satellites and have had the Poles as their research area have been able to photograph and film this entrance, which is a reality! The fact that it is not yet recognised probably serves certain interests.
- First of all, there is talk of a so-called inner world – proven to exist! Let's call it an inner realm.
- Is this inner realm inhabited? This is where the question marks come in. Calculations found belonging to the American expedition of Richard Byrd, countless revelations made following German expeditions there and many others confirm that there is a presence there. It could be a human presence, perhaps a part of Earth's civilisation that has retreated there, while others say it is a presence of a different kind. It is likely that a certain terrestrial biotope is being preserved there.

For now, there are many hypotheses."

Nikolai Roerich – Himalayas Abode of Light, Russian by birth, Indian by adoption, mystical painter and visionary, in the late 1920s Nikolai Roerich (1874-1947) undertook a long expedition to Central Asia, searching for a certain point in northern Tibet, where he hoped to find the entrance to Agartha and the Kingdom of Shambhala – the territory beneath Karakorum.

In his book Himalayas Abode of Light (1947), he recounts: "I remember that while crossing Karakorum, a Ladakhi servant told me that beneath us were numerous underground cavities where all kinds of treasures could be found and where a wonderful people lived, ignorant of the sins of the world.

As we approached Hotan, we could feel the ground beneath our horses' hooves, and our guide continued to tell us about the torrents that guard the entrance to Agartha and how the impure who approach the entrance to Agartha die, poisoned by toxic fumes."

But what connection could there be between Roerich and Agartha?

In his book "Sfidarea Timpului" (Defying Time), Sorin Stefanescu expresses the opinion that Roerich came into contact with the teachings of ancient Asian cultures, becoming a kind of spokesperson for them alongside the governments of the great powers. This explains why, at one point, returning from a solitary journey on horseback, Roerich uttered a strange prophecy:

"The stars are manifesting a new evolution, and the Cosmic Fire will once again approach the Earth. Humanity will be subjected to new trials. But just as Light devours darkness, the works of Evil will be destroyed, and the Master of the new era will manifest Himself in all His splendour."

Roerich also made a significant contribution to the establishment of the League of Nations, designing the Flag of Peace, a white flag with three red dots placed in a circle, which became known as the Red Cross of Culture, a flag intended to protect cultural monuments.

of Peace, a white flag with three red dots arranged in a circle, which became known as the Red Cross of Culture, a flag designed to protect cultural monuments.

We cannot fail to remember Jules Verne's famous story entitled "Journey to the Centre of the Earth," written in 1864. It describes this so clearly that it seems as if the author knew those realities in detail.

Hitler himself embraced the idea of an Empty Earth. In 1942, in the midst of the war, Hitler ordered a secret expedition. Accompanied by physicist Heinz Fisher, the soldiers landed on the island of Rügen in the Baltic Sea.

After Hitler's death, many refused to believe in such a banal end to one of the greatest destinies of mankind, convinced that he had not committed suicide and that, together with his aides, he had slipped into the depths of the Earth, where they all lived happily ever after.

Contra-Admiral R. E. Byrd flew to the North and South Poles between 1947 and 1956. According to Admiral Richard E. Byrd (the first man to fly over the North Pole), 2,300 miles beyond the North Pole there is an entrance to the centre of the Earth, where a much more advanced human civilisation lives. Those who left Earth moved underground 100,000 years ago. A war that took place at that time destroyed the Earth's surface and created deserts.

In an interview he gave in 1947, Byrd stated that 2,300 miles beyond the North Pole he encountered an area with a very warm climate, vegetation, mountains, lakes and rivers.

Byrd, a renowned explorer beyond reproach, noted very precisely in his diary what he encountered in this area. "The people who live here communicate telepathically. In fact, they do not live on the surface. Under the ground, several miles deep, there is a very large city with millions of inhabitants, called Agartha. There are several cities under the ground, in different parts of the globe, but Agartha is the most important of them," Byrd wrote in his secret diary.

These pages from the explorer's diary were made public by Virgil Armstrong, a former CIA agent.

Armstrong claims that Byrd lived in Agartha for almost a month and that he describes the underground civilisation as "far superior to us". The former CIA agent added that immediately after the discovery of Byrd's diary, the pages referring to Agartha were declared classified and it was ordered that American military bases be set up at the entrance to the underground city to prevent intruders from entering under any circumstances.

Armstrong also revealed that the US government had established relations with the Great Council of Agartha. Furthermore, the flying saucers that appear in the sky are means of transport for the inhabitants of the underground world, and some of the technology used to manufacture them has been disclosed to the Pentagon, "the invisible aircraft being a result of this advanced knowledge". Sometimes you think; other times you wonder why you think. That's when reason comes into play. The occult, magic, religion... they're not as different as you think.

Admiral Richard E. Byrd was born on 25 October 1888 in Winchester, Virginia. In May 1926, he became the first man to fly over the North Pole, and in November 1929, the first man to fly over the South Pole. Between 1928 and 1955, he made 11 geographical expeditions to the poles. On 19 February 1947, he left for the North Pole to photograph the aurora borealis.

Seeing that he was not returning, those at the base reported him missing. Byrd returned on 11 March 1947 and described "The Land Beyond the Pole-Agartha". Coincidentally, Admiral Richard E. Byrd died exactly 10 years later, on 11 March 1957. He was promoted to admiral in 1950, and in 1952 he received the Medal of Honour from the US Government.

Honour from the US Government. One of the US Navy's cruisers was also named after him. So it is out of the question that Byrd was just a madman hallucinating at the North Pole.

Returning to Agent Armstrong, he revealed some more details from Byrd's diary: "The admiral describes in detail how the underground cities are inhabited by people with delicate features, who live for thousands of years, but whose age does not show on their faces.

Those in Agartha know the secret of physical immortality. Once they consider that they have lived long enough, they choose the moment when they will withdraw from life. Their women give birth only once, or twice in their long lives, and gestation lasts only three months. They give birth in temples, in special pools of water. Childbirth is painless.

Armstrong also says: "The Atlanteans communicate through telepathy, and the Lemurians speak a language called Maru, which is the common root of Sanskrit and Hebrew. Now, the two civilisations live in peace and harmony. They are ruled by a Supreme Council of 12 people, 6 men and 6 women.

The cities are artificially lit and have a controlled atmosphere, much purer than that on the surface. Urban agglomerations are structured on several levels. The underground inhabitants travel between cities using high-speed vehicles (approximately 3,000 miles per hour) that float. It remains to be seen what is true of all this, with scientists considering the satellite photograph to be a first step towards discovering the truth.

Raymond Bernard – A Hidden World (1969)!

The idea of a new world has captured the imagination of many. Dr Raymond Bernard wrote the book "The Hollow Earth", after which he initiated the construction of a settlement in South America, determined to discover possible entrances that would take him on the journey of his life. Later, he disappeared without a trace in one of the caves of the Amazon, and his followers were convinced that he had achieved his goal.

Referring to the absolute secrecy surrounding Byrd's missions, the well-known American geophysicist Raymond Bernard states in his book A Hidden World (1969): "Admiral Byrd's discovery is today a top international secret. After Byrd announced his discovery by radio and after brief notes appeared in the press, all subsequent news on the subject was carefully removed by government agencies."

Based on a series of documents by William Reed, Marshall B. Gardner, Huguenin and Ray Palmer, as well as Admiral Byrd's revelation, Bernard drew several conclusions, which at the time caused a great scandal:

- a) In reality, there is no North or South Pole, only wide openings leading into the hollow interior of the Earth;
- b) UFOs come from this hollow interior;
- c) The interior of the Earth is heated by a central sun, which is the source of the aurora borealis. The climate here is subtropical, neither cold nor hot.
- d) Polar explorers have seen with their own eyes animals moving north in search of food. They have seen tropical birds and animals that normally need warmth, they have seen butterflies and even mosquitoes. The magnetic North Pole – a line 1,500 km long.

There are legends, engravings and even very ancient sculptures describing Agartha. It is said that there are about 100 cities underground, spread across the entire globe, the largest of which is Agartha.

The underground world is also known as Shamballa and Agarha. According to documents, the inhabitants of this world left the surface 100,000 years ago, following a catastrophic war between the Atlanteans and the Lemurians, the two great civilisations that ruled the Earth.

The war is described in the two works Ramayana and Mahabharata. As a result of this war, due to the very powerful weapons used, desert areas such as the Sahara, Gobi, the wastelands of Australia and the USA were created, places where the urban agglomerations of the Atlanteans and Lemurians had been located.

The atmosphere on the surface was unbreathable, so the survivors of the conflict retreated underground. According to these theories, the people on the surface are the descendants of those who refused to retreat to the underground cities and who, in the meantime, became savage.

The most powerful underground cities:

POSID – the first refuge of the Atlanteans, with an entrance in the Matto-Grosso area, with a population of 1.3 million inhabitants;

SHONSHE – the refuge of the Uyghurs, a branch of the Lemurians, entrance in the Himalayas, 3.5 million inhabitants; RAMA – near Jaipur, India, 1 million inhabitants;

SHINGWA – on the border between China and Mongolia, with 1.5 million inhabitants;

TELOS – near Mount Lassen, California, with 1.5 million inhabitants. The cities are located at depths ranging from 1.5 to 2 miles below the Earth's crust.

Both Sumerian writings and the Bible speak of a "Deep of the Waters," a "Lower World," an "Underworld," etc. Mesopotamian texts speak of the Land of Mines, stating that it was a mountainous land with vast plateaus covered with grass and steppe (from here the Nephilim and the giants – their offspring – extracted metals, especially gold, which was needed on the planet Eris/Nibiru – n.a.), with lush vegetation... It was, therefore, a bright land, as all texts stated, permanently bathed in sunlight.

The ancient writings of the Chinese, Egyptians, Indians and other peoples, as well as Eskimo legends, speak of the great opening in the north and of an advanced people living in a mysterious country called Agartha. This is the general name that defines the world inside the Earth, as well as all its colonies. Some claim that Shambala, located inside Mount Meru in Tibet, is the capital of this world.

The Land of White Waters from Russian legends, located somewhere in Central Asia, near Lake Lobnor, attracted the attention of Prince Vladimir of Kiev. In 987, he organised a real expedition led by Father Sergius, who had heard about the fascinating land at a monastery on Mount Athos. However, the years passed, and the expedition and its members were forgotten. In 1043, an old man appeared in Kiev, claiming to be Father Sergius, who had returned from the long-forgotten expedition.

"Romanian Mythology" by Romulus Vulcanescu talks about the civilisation in the centre of the Earth!

Similar references can be found in Romanian traditions. In the book "Romanian Mythology," Romulus Vulcanescu, in the chapter "Mother Earth," talks about the white world (where people live), which includes the White Islands.

"These urici lived at the edge of the world in a white island or in several white islands in the bed of the Sambetei River. The islands of the Rohmanians or Blajini rose from the Sambetei River under the cosmogonic conditions of the rising of the earth from the primordial waters.

This means that, in mythical conception, islands symbolise unspoilt lands, emerging in their pure state from the Water of the Dead, which is itself a sacred water, except that its degree of sacredness depends on its progressive impurity in the direction of Hell. According to an ancient legend, the Water of the Seven Springs springs from the roots of the cosmic fir tree and surrounds the earth seven or nine times before flowing into Hell.

At its source, it is pure and high above the earth, a universal panacea. As it surrounds the earth, its purity decreases, and when it enters Hell, it boils in flames. On Easter Sunday, in some villages, eggshells, crumbs of Easter cake and candles were placed in wooden bowls on the banks of flowing waters and set adrift on the water to reach the Water of the Holy Trinity in the White Islands of the Rohmani or Blajini, so that they too could celebrate Easter. The white urici observed many white fasts and dressed in white, a sign of their spiritual purity..... Among the Romanians, white mourning for the elderly (codalbi) was maintained until our time in some villages in Baragan and the Eastern Carpathians.

Maura Anghel on Blajini Easter!

Paștele Blajinilor, Paștele Morților or Lunea Morților is a pagan holiday with a variable date, dedicated to the spirits of ancestors. The roots of this holiday come from pre-Christian times, when our ancestors were pagans. This is also attested to by a multitude of legends from the folklore treasure trove of our people.

The Blajinii (Rohmani or Rugmani) are mythical representations of the first humans on earth. It is said that the Blajinii live underground, in the Other World, beyond the River of Sîmbete. It is said that they took part in the creation of the world and that they support the pillars of the earth.

Imagine blond people who are considered descendants of Seth (the third son of Adam and Eve). The Blajinii lead a pious and carefree life based on virtue and the inability to do harm. Men meet women once a year, at Blajinii Easter, to procreate. Boys are raised by their mothers until they can walk and feed themselves, after which they live in isolation with the men. The Blajinii are faithful, kind-hearted, gentle and wise, incapable of doing harm, and lead an austere life with severe fasting.

It is believed that they live on the banks of large rivers or near islands or on the border with Heaven, and that it is always warm in their country. The Blajini do not know how to calculate holidays, whose arrival is announced to them by humans. They know that it is Easter when they see red eggshells floating on the Apa Sîmbetei (Holy Water), which are thrown into the water by housewives on Friday or Saturday during Holy Week.

When they see eggshells in their distant land, they celebrate Easter, and people celebrate the Easter of the Blessed or the Easter of the Dead. On this day, believers place offerings on graves, distribute alms, and set tables in the cemetery, near the church or in the field, on the green grass.

Documentary: Journey to the Hollow Earth (2005)!

An interesting documentary that addresses, for the first time in a coherent manner, the Hollow Earth theory. It reviews the history, mythology and folklore on this subject. It raises provocative, exciting questions that, at least for me, have made me more sceptical about the official theory.

After all, what do scientists really know about the centre of the Earth? They do nothing but speculate. They have beliefs and dogmas, but no clear evidence that the Earth has a molten iron core. The deepest boreholes have not exceeded a few tens of kilometres. The Earth's crust is approximately 6,000 km thick (the Earth's diameter is 12,756 km). Why should we disregard other theories and beliefs? Why should we believe only the dogmas and beliefs of the religion called Science?
